BEEYOUTIFUL

Hello My Beeyoutiful Friends!

Welcome to our second Beeyoutiful Newsletter! I am super excited about this newsletter because I get to give away a FREE product! That always makes me very happy and I hope it puts a smile on your face as well.

In-case any of you missed this...We live in Tennessee. Ticks seem to regard Tennessee as their own personal utopia and seem to be everywhere both in quantity and variety. I did some reading and research a while back on how to safely remove ticks without the traditional yank and pull method which risks leaving the parasites head behind OR causing a chunk of skin to be removed along with the tick. Both of those results are often painful and less than ideal. Somewhere or other I stumbled over the recommendation of saturating the tick with essential oil, the oil soaks into the skin and around the ticks mouth and causes them to turn loose automatically because their tasty blood feast isn't so yummy anymore.

All excited about this "pain free" alternative (which btw was also alluded to as being an effective prevention of Lymes) I eagerly waited for the next victim -I mean, person to get a tick for me to experiment on. I waited...And waited...And waited some more. My husband Steve spread diatomaceous earth around our yard a couple of years ago because it was reputed to do away with ticks and other problem bug like critters. We had seed ticks by the thousands. Apparently it worked because the past couple of years ticks have been kinda scarce around our yard. Still. There were plenty of ticks in the woods and elsewhere so it had to be only a matter of days...maybe a couple of weeks...right? Try a couple of MONTHS later I finally got my hands on a real life person with a tick that wasn't too terrified of my concoctions to allow me to experiment on her.

Tick squirming miserably after the oil is dripped upon it.

Same area after the tick was removed. Can't even tell it was ever there!

A nice medium sized tick had a firm grip upon her scalp. What I had read recommended soaking a cotton ball in essential oil and taping it over the tick for a little while, checking periodically to see if it had let go. Since this was in the middle of her head tape didn't seem like a viable option so I decided to just drip drop the essential oil neat directly over the tick. Once assured that the oil would in no way hurt her hair, my trusting companion consented to the modified protocol.

I watched closely to see any reactions from the tick as Beeyoutiful's Tea Tree Essential oil (my weapon of choice since it is very safe to be applied neat, which means without dilution) slowly saturated him, the surrounding hair and skin. A miserable squirming commenced, and after a couple minutes I could see him frantically trying to back away. He opened his jaws and seemed to be trying to "spit out" or unhook his little pincers from her skin. When he had just barely a bit of it left in his jaws I quickly tugged him away (concerned that at the rate of his current squirming and scrabbling if he got totally unhooked he would disappear into other parts of her hair). A tiny flake of skin came away with his jaws. BUT there was no bleeding, no red mark, no NOTHING. You couldn't even tell where he had been. Thankfully for once I remembered to take before and after pictures of the process. Well, they are really more like during and after...I forgot to take a picture before I dropped the oil on.

Tea Tree Oil is really the jack-of-all-trades. I found it works for most every sick bug and cleaning need I have. Just don't swallow it. Made from a tree that grows only on the east coast of Australia, tea tree oil has documented antiviral, antibacterial, and anti-fungal properties. I have use it for first-aid on cuts, scrapes, and burns--and as a wart remover. I have seen Tea tree oil help control problems as diverse as dandruff, head lice, vaginal yeast infections, jock itch, athlete's foot, cold sores, ringworm, shingles--and its cousin, chicken pox. As an asthmatic tea tree oil vapors helps colds and bronchial distress. What's more, bugs hate tea tree oil, so it works well in a homemade repellent and is helpful for insect bites. Add tea tree oil to your laundry to kill dust mites and to purify after sickness. I use tea tree oil mixed with vinegar, grapefruit seed extract and water as an all-purpose cleaner in a spray bottle. Add borax to the mix and it can be used in your dishwasher or garbage disposal. Whew! and to think I could add "and that's not all" to the end of this list.

Tea Tree Oil is one of the most diversified, and beneficial oils. A requirement for every essential oil user! Since I feel so strongly that no home should be without a bottle of Tea Tree Oil I talked to Steve and we came up with a way for us to offer our customers a FREE bottle of this fantastic stuff. For 30 days only with any order $50 or more use the coupon code FREETTO. Subtotal needs to be $50 before adding Tea Tree Oil to your order.
